To whom it may concern:

I have worked in cooperation with George Kasey for the last year. George is an extraordinarily talented, brilliant and independent person. Last semester he presented a series of 12 guest lectures to my class in the philosophy of design, specifically on communications design. In addition he has worked both on the Media Access problems of the Bay area in conjunction with The Committee for Open Media and on the establishment of a new communications course in the Philosophy Department. This course will, I think, be the first of its kind to combine social philosophy, theory of design and theory of communications.

George does not have a degree. He believes and advocates liberal as opposed to formal education, especially in the Humanities. Nevertheless, he is an exceptionally well educated and academically proficient person. He reads and he has an incredible ability to use library resources. He is creative and knowledgeable about design, education, information processing, and communications.

I recommend him highly to you for any job in the field of communications design. In my course last semester I took a chance on this unorthodox fellow: I was not disappointed

Yours truly
